Reforms

Now that the national companies legislation is in force, the Commonwealth and the Ministerial Council can turn their attention to those areas of the law which require legislative reform. The areas which will remain on the corporate law reform agenda after Parliament has dealt with the Corporations (Insider Trading) Amendment Bill include loans to directors, directors' duties, directors' indemnities and liability insurance and, of course, the recommendations of the Australian Law Reform Commission in ALRC 45 for the reform of the law relating to corporate insolvency. This issue of Reform covers a recent speech discussing the Commission's recommendations for the reform of insolvency law. □

Aboriginal Law Bulletin

The Aboriginal Law Bulletin is a journal which covers legal issues relating to Aboriginal people in a social and historical context. It is published every two months by the Aboriginal Law Centre, Faculty of Law at the University of New South Wales.

The April 1991 issue is about policing Aboriginal communities. Proposed articles include:

- Barbara Miller from the Aboriginal Co-ordinating Council, Cairns, on the possibilities which community policing provide for addressing the law and order crisis on trust communities in far-north Queensland.
- Chris Cunneen, a Lecturer in Law at Sydney University, provides a qualitative and quantitative analysis of police violence against Aboriginal juveniles in New South Wales, Queensland and Western Australia.
- Ian Robinson from the Queensland Criminal Justice Commission considers the impact of the Fitzgerald Report on Queensland Aboriginal people with special reference to community based policing and police accountability.
- Mary Edmunds from the Australian Institute of Aboriginal and Islander Studies compares policing methods in Roebourne (WA) and Tennant Creek (NT) with particular reference to community involvement.
